

Correspondence

Studies in the Maternal www.mamsie.bbk.uk

Anne Verougstraete

Birkbeck, 2009

I wish to use an exchange of letters between Lou Andreas-Salomé and Rainer Maria Rilke as the basis for a discussion of the "Unheimliche". The selected short extracts alternate between the 'conscience to be one' (separated or in fusion with the Other) and the matrixial conscience of a borderspace shared with an intimate unknown Other. They evoke the phallic layer related to the "castration complex" and they gradually move towards the matrixial layer, where the dimension of plurality is originary.

Worpswede near Bremen

July 18, 1903

Dear Lou, I must tell you (...)

And once late in autumn a little old woman stood beside me one evening in the light of a shop window. She stood very still, and I thought that like me she was busy looking at the things displayed for sale, and so I scarcely paid her any mind. Finally, though, her presence began to make me uneasy, and, I don't know why, I suddenly looked down at her oddly clasped, worn-away hands. Very, very slowly an old, long, thin pencil emerged from those hands, it grew taller and taller and took a very long time to become completely visible, visible in all its wretchedness. I can't say exactly what it was that made this scene so terrible, but it seemed to me as if a whole destiny were being played out before me, a long destiny, a catastrophe that was building up fearfully to the moment when the pencil would cease growing and, trembling ever so slightly, topple out of the loneliness of those empty hands. Finally I understood that I was supposed to buy it...

Rainer¹

¹ Rilke Rainer Maria and Andreas-Salomé Lou, The Correspondence, W.W.Norton & Cy NY London, 2006, p.52

According to phallic logic, the poet's glance is focused on a fixed point: the objects on display. In the pane of glass in front of him, he becomes aware of the reflection of a little old woman, who emerges, discrete and separate, alongside him. Are they both trying to reconquer the lost object - by mastery and control? The reflection captures the glance, making believe in similarity, while the poet stands beside the passer-by in disaffectedness: 'I thought that like me she was busy looking at the things displayed for sale, and so I scarcely paid her any mind.'

But the proximity to the matrixial phantasy related to the encounter of the prenatal feminine in the Real brings about a change. The little old - eventually archaic - woman is not standing in forcible proximity but she stood very still, in fragile vulnerability, in besidedness. Her presence becomes increasingly tangible. Awakened from the anaesthesia of his disaffectedness, the poet consents to not knowing what is going on. His glance suddenly moves towards the 'unheimliche'. This unconscious movement paves the way for an 'encounter-event': 'Finally, though, her presence began to make me uneasy, and, I don't know why, I suddenly looked down at her oddly clasped, worn-away hands.' In this movement toward an encounter-event, the experiences of porousness and sharing are interlaced. It marks the threshold, simultaneously a point of transgression and a halting-point. Bracha Ettinger calls 'these relations and processes of change and exchange in which the non-I is a partner-in-difference of the I'² 'borderlinking'. At the unstable border between the self and the other, the visible and the invisible, the familiar and the unfamiliar, is a transsubjective psychic zone of affective and informative contact. In the space filled by the co-presence of the anonymous intimate partial poet and the worn hands of the intimate anonymous passer-by, existence comes to itself. 'The co-emergence in difference corresponds to a feminine dimension of subjectivity, since joint recordings of shared-but-singular and particular experiences re- evoke archaic phantasies of the link between the female invisible bodily specificity and the late prenatal subject-to-be.'³ The awareness experienced by Rilke shows that men have also known an intra-uterine existence and that the matrix is oriented towards the feminine in both men and women: 'Very, very slowly an old, long, thin pencil emerged from those hands, it grew taller and taller and took a very long time to become completely visible, visible in all its wretchedness.'

² Ettinger Bracha L., The Matrixial Borderspace, Foreword Butler- Pollock, Minneapolis London, 2006, p. 63

³ Ibid., p.69

Is it the apparition of absolute destitution which has something so uncanny? Superimpositions are making themselves felt: oscillations of touch, variations of pressure, fluctuations of movements. An originary repressed comes back to the surface. The erotic antennae of the psyche allow themselves to be affected to the vivid point of pain and pleasure, by the unbearably intensifying impression. Gradually emerging, the old pencil carries traces of an ancient scripture to the present: 'I can't say exactly what it was that made this scene so terrible, but it seemed to me as if a whole destiny were being played out before me, a long destiny, a catastrophe that was building up fearfully to the moment when the pencil would cease growing and, trembling ever so slightly, topple out of the loneliness of those empty hands.'

The strange aesthetic experience is overdetermined. The recognized as uncognized experience concerns the relation-without-relating to the maternal corporeal "thing" and to the archaic events, forever mysterious and out of touch, having however opened to the touch. 'The I's passivity is transformed by the non-I's activity in jointness-in-differentiating by the passage through channels of trans-sensitive borderlinking.'⁴ The opening to the other and to the world does not go through primary affects of rejection and abjection but through fascination and primary compassion. Throughout the lasting process of the encounter-event, the I is not looking for the cause of anxiety but for what comes towards it, and for hospitality. Wit(h)ness of the passage through the trauma of otherness, the poet cautions the action of the old woman in self-relinquishment to what the border situated glance did initiate. Does he recognize an initially non-frightening experience, impregnated by movement? He progressively consents to a certain fading of trembling movements and to the loneliness of his existence in the emptiness of the loss of the origin. 'Embracing instants of matrixial borderlinking orient the subject - in this instance the poet as individuated subject

⁴ Bracha L. Ettinger, From proto-ethical compassion to responsibility, in Revue « Athena », éd. Versus Aureus, Lithuania, 2006 NR.2, p. 110

- towards responsibility.⁵ This 'aesthetical' proto-ethical com-passion paves the way to ethics.⁶

He understands that in the common use of the pencil of the poetic writing, he gives a certain presence to the first invisible relations to the other he carries in him. Consciously prompted by a feeling of obligation, he chooses to make it his own. Paying homage to the otherness of himself and of the world, and endorsing it, he makes us encounter our own otherness:

'Finally I understood that I was supposed to buy it'

Let us listen to the reply of Lou Andreas-Salomé :

{Westend near Berlin}Rüsternallee

36.

July 22, 1903

Dear Rainer,

As I read your last letter there were moments when what you described made such an impact on me, came alive through the smallest physical detail and yet grew beyond it into the tremendously human, that I forgot about you completely. And I felt that odd process of "ensouling" that can emanate even from impressions of misery when they come not just straight from life but channelled through the life of that person creating them, transmuting them. For you are wrong when you say that you merely suffered through all these things as a helpless accessory without repeating them in some higher process. They are all there: no longer only in you, now also in me, and external to both of us living things with a voice all their own (...)

Lou⁷

Although she does not theorise the matrixial, Lou places herself in the complex zone of encounter along which unconscious (transferential) dimensions cause subtle dynamics of

⁵ Ibid. p. 111

⁶ Ibid. p. 111

⁷ Rilke Rainer M and Andreas-Salomé Lou, The Correspondence, W.W.Norton & Co NY London, 2006, p.57

borderlinking. She surpasses the rhythmic movement of presence and absence and reveals that the emergence of meaning depends on shareability and jointness and on the changes of distance-in-proximity.⁸ She elicits the organic links connecting the poet's singular experience to a vast human dimension, beyond him. 'The matrixial dimension reveals a new perspective, that of the impossibility of not-sharing in the Thing-event.'⁹ Could that odd process of "ensouling" felt by Lou be a 'diffused matrixial affect of minimal pleasure-with-displeasure, like those of awe, alertness, astonishment or compassion ?'¹⁰ In a single movement she links trauma and the community. She honours a creative principle that is not without relationship to what Bracha Ettinger calls metramorphosis: 'In its function as a passage to the Symbolic, it acts from the shareable borderspace to create and redistribute the traces of these joint transformations of encounters.'¹¹ Lou gives Rilke an echo of the transforming effect of his letter on her and beyond, noticing that the one is already in the other, forever 'bound within matrixial nets composed of psychic-mental strings and shared threads and working-through in metramorphosis.'¹² 'For you are wrong when you say that you merely suffered through all these things as a helpless accessory without repeating them in some higher process.'

The traces of all things which the poet has ever experienced were partially 'cross-inscribed' in multiple small matrixial weavings, that returned displaced, redistributed, and artistically augmented: 'They are all there : no longer only in you, now also in me, and external to both of us living things with a voice all their own'.

8 Ettinger Bracha L., The Matrixial Borderspace, Foreword Butler-Pollock, Minneapolis London, 2006, p.70

⁹ Ibid. p.74

¹⁰ Ibid. p.64

¹¹ Ibid. p.64

¹² Bracha L.Ettinger, From proto-ethical compassion to responsibility, in Revue « Athena », éd. Versus Aureus, Lithuania, 2006 NR.2, p. 116